CIFAL Płock: Water in urban areas

March 22nd – March 24th, 2011

In urban economy water can be a precious resource serving not only drinking and sanitary needs of inhabitants, but also enhancing cities' image and adding to their recreational and residential attractiveness. If mismanaged, it can be however a significant cost to local taxpayers and even a threat to their property, health or lives. Local policies with this regard and quality of their implementation will determine what this gift of the nature will constitute for urban population.

An interdisciplinary group of experts: geographers, planners, architects, sociologists, hydrologists, but also the representatives of local actors from Central and Eastern European countries will exchange experiences and share their knowledge on various aspects of water use in urban areas with an aim to establish international and interregional cooperation.
